Rationale

This is a master's degree aimed at acquiring knowledge and developing competencies in microcredit in impoverished settings, outside and within the European framework.

It also enables work by and for in favor of Financial Inclusion from a microfinance institution, a bank, an NGO, or from international development agencies.

Microcredits are seen as a highly effective tool for economic and social development, human capacity building, and environmental sustainability, both in development cooperation projects and in local development projects.

As development agents, universities should promote development cooperation by offering new professional and international volunteering opportunities for well-trained individuals.

There is a scarcity of online postgraduate degrees that specifically address this topic while linking contents from social and legal sciences with health-related areas.
